In "Life of Love" [vol. II, pp. 99-100], Marie-Paule wrote:

Poor man, standing there before me, gesticulating in rage! How can he possibly understand that I do not feel the slightest bitterness or hatred for him; that I go humbly along my way under the eyes of God?

How can he understand that his depraved life is the cause of all our suffering; that it is through his terrible pride that he will be lost?

I am prepared to accept any suffering, to go to the very end of my calvary, in silence and in love, in order to be able, one day, to crush the head of the serpent, and to vanquish all those demons that have taken possession of his mind and his heart.

His hatred may cover me with calumny and wound me to the depths of my soul; it may touch every aspect of my life, but, by the grace of God, Love, always love will guide my soul.

Though everyone should league together against me, I want to offer in return only love, the true love that renders good for evil, that smiles so it may not weep and that offers to the Father the agony of each day, to the end that the world may be regenerated and finally bow its head before Him who has so loved us.

Yes, may the world be set afire with Love! The cost matters little to me.

Mother: Thus said the Lady.

Assembly: May she be blessed forever.
